If you're like me, you have something of a daily routine. Once I settle in at work I love to grab my coffee, check the news, and get my daily dose of color inspiration.

This is why I've fallen for the website "The Day's Color (<http://www.thedayscolor.com>). A simplistic, color palette released daily for a movie, a song, or nearly anything that uses or inspires color can be delivered in a presentation not too dissimilar to Rothko's color fields.

This daily project is the brainchild of Nigel Evan Dennis, a graphic designer who has taken to simplifying the visual medium to its bare color components.

What this delivers is a nearly voyeuristic view of the color elements of our favorite things at their most exposed.

RADIOHEAD - KID A REVISITED

Like in this recent post, Dennis boils down the palette to Radiohead's Kid A.

"Color can adjust our perception. It can effect the way our food tastes. It can increase the emotional and intuitive level of an experience. It can turn us off, turn us on. It is psychological. It is emotional. Color is a wonderful thing. Retain it,"

– Nigel Evan Dennis

LAKE MICHIGAN PURE COLOUR

It's not all pop culture, movies, or music on The Day's Color. Sometimes a color palette can present how something looks that day. Like this post from May 3rd that breaks down Chicago's Lake Michigan in a simple refreshing palette.

As an aside, I grew up in Chicago. I spent the first quarter century of my life in The Windy City. This color palette is spot on. Chicago in the springtime is truly something to see.

BLADE RUNNER

Movies and TV shows are also a big part of The Day's Color. Here, Dennis deconstructs the cult classic Blade Runner:

(<http://thechromologist.com/wp-content/uploads/2014/06/NigelDennis-thedayscolor-bladerunner.jpg>)

"It's a challenge making sure I capture what I feel is the essence of each subject through color." Dennis explained in a recent interview with Fast Company.

That may be what make these so unique. Much like the reason Rothko's Color Fields has resonated with me. It's not that Dennis nails the colors used, anyone with Photoshop can eye-drop a few colors. It's because Dennis' work here, just like Rothko, evokes an emotion.

And Dennis managed to capture the soul of each item he's chosen to deconstruct.

Sure, I may need to tell you that this is the palette from Spike Jonze’s movie Her, but the feeling it evokes is immediate.
