Speed to Contact - Crucial When Buying Internet Mortgage Leads

By Chaz Wilke, Content Writer

23 June 2014

As a lender, you always need fresh leads. Without leads you wouldn't be in business. But beyond that, have you considered the speed needed to capture and convert a lead into a customer?

The balancing act between "speed to contact" (how quickly you communicate with new prospects) and aggressive urgency is one that, as a lender, you must learn to perform with confidence. After all, a lead won't become a customer unless you persuade him or her to trust you.

And that trust building starts during your initial contact.

Initial Contact with Your Mortgage Leads

However, the speed with which you contact each inbound lead can be crucial to your success. A study conducted at the Sloan School of Management at Massachusetts Institute of Technology says that there's a steep drop-off in effectiveness as leads cool. Effectiveness dropped so quickly that the difference between five and 10 minutes resulted in a fivefold decrease in conversion success. And the difference between five and 30 minutes showed the success rate drop by 100 times.

The same research indicates that the first lender to contact a lead improves his chances of converting the prospect by 238%. Those two metrics together show the incredible importance of being first and being fast!

These statistics have helped illustrate the need for online direct-call programs. In direct call programs affiliates promote a phone number that prospects can call. The prospects answer a few questions through an automated prompt, and then they are delivered directly to you as an exclusive, hot lead. With that, you won't need to chase down the lead in those precious five minutes.

From there, it's merely a matter of nurturing the prospect into converting.

Nurture Your Mortgage Leads

The speed of initial contact is crucial in the sales cycle. But nurturing each lead also speeds up the conversion process. Realtrends.com states that “Typically 3 to 5 percent of your online leads will convert into a transaction in the first 120 days.” This leaves the vast majority of leads outside that four month window. Those remaining leads need additional nurturing before converting.

The 95-97% of leads that don’t convert within 120 days will then need to get filtered through your conversion funnel. Software packages will help with the tracking and follow-up while these leads travel through the funnel. Without a solid tracking system in place, managing your follow-up schedule and remembering each lead and their needs will be challenging.

It is important to remember that these prospects are people not products. The most important factor in nurturing a lead is the understanding that people need time to make large purchase decisions. First-time buyers might be young and confused by the process. Many are hearing words that are common in the lender’s vocabulary for the first time. Some won’t know what an LTV is, or might confuse a HELOC for a 1950’s sci-fi movie villain.

Creating a false sense of urgency just to make a quick sale damages your chances of actually closing the deal. Have patience and understand the giant step forward in life each lead represents. By doing so, you may be rewarded. Studies conducted by Market2Lead have shown that nurtured leads have a 23% shorter deal time than their non-nurtured counterparts.

Takeaway

The speed to contact each lead is imperative in the Internet age. Your leads live in a world where instant gratification is a constant in most people’s lives. The statistics show that you must jump on each lead as you receive them to best capitalize on the potential of converting that lead. This is why direct call programs have begun in earnest across the mortgage lead industry. It's worth checking out and will be helpful when trying to keep your speed to contact as fast as possible.
