12 Unusually Great Ways to Drive Traffic to Your Site

By Chaz Wilke, Staff Writer
February 14, 2014

You've guest blogged post after post, you've optimized your site like an SEO wizard, and you've barely seen your traffic increase.

After exhausting the list of obvious ways to increase your visitor count, you may be pulling your hair out trying to understand where you've gone wrong. Maybe your content is great! Maybe your writing pops with flair and personality. But maybe people still just aren't coming to your site.

If you're blogging as part of an affiliate marketing content strategy, then those people that aren't coming are costing you potential leads and money.

We've compiled a list of 12 unusually great ways to draw people to your site. Some are simple and can be done in minutes from the comfort of your own home. Some will actually require you to leave the house.

So brace yourself, you may need to put on pants for this.

1. Mentions and Invitations

Any subject you write about will usually have a few prominent members in that community as figureheads. From sports to finance, there are always a few power players that are in the forefront of each industry.

There's one undying truth about these types, they always enjoy a shout out. So be sure to mention them in your article.

But don't stop there.

Send them an email. Give them a link to your story. Invite them to read all the nice things you wrote about them. Getting prominent voices in the community to engage with your article can create a huge uptick in visitors to your site.

Don't be too forward on your request for them to retweet or share your article, bank on your stellar writing for that! Just send a polite salutation and mention that they came up in your article and they might be interested in checking it out.

Hope for the best, maybe they'll like it enough to spread it to all their friends and followers.

2. Twitter Cross-Promotion

Don't be shy when you publish an article.

Shout your announcement that there's fresh content on your site from the proverbial mountaintop! While it's become standard practice to send out a friendly reminder to your followers, also consider piggybacking your article on trending topics and events.

Even if your article isn't directly related to whatever is going on, find creative ways to incorporate it. For example, if a reality dating show is trending and you've written an article about home ownership, consider tweeting a wry wink at the contestants of the show getting married and settling down along with a handy little link to your article.

Creative context is often what separates novice from pro marketing. Find any link between big news and your articles. If you can't find any, create that link and present it with confidence. You'd be surprised how receptive people will be to a confident call that beckons them to your site.

As a word of caution, it's wise to avoid piggybacking on negative news stories with your article. Use your better judgment and steer clear of promoting your piece with anything someone could consider tragic.

3. Engage in conversation outside your site

Operating in the contained space of your personal website may feel comfortable. Your site is your playground. You control the message and you moderate the discussion. However, the simple act of commenting on other blogs that relate to the topics of interest to your target audience may increase your visibility as an authority in the community.

Also, get involved on Q & A sites like Yahoo Answers and even consider running an AMA (Ask Me Anything) on Reddit. If you position yourself as an expert in the field, you might be surprised to find the groundswell that massive community can offer.

Reddit AMA's have been proven to raise people to social prominence nearly overnight. Case in point, Chris Hadfield, a Canadian astronaut, had become an internet darling through consistent and meaningful interaction on Reddit. His AMA logged more than 7600 comments.

You're probably thinking: "but he's an astronaut and that's a really interesting job." Well, stop for a moment and think about that.

Think about the previous disinterest in space exploration. The US government is continually cutting NASA's budget, they've indefinitely grounded all manned space flights, and have retired the Atlantis and Endeavor shuttles.

Col. Hadfield almost single-handedly reinvigorated an entire nation's interest through his infectious passion for what he does.

And you can do the same.

Present a meaningful and compelling argument for why your passion is interesting and important, and a following will materialize behind you as if you are the pied piper of Hamelin.

Don't be afraid to consider offbeat ideas.

Col. Hadfield is an engineer and an astronaut, but he also lugged a guitar with him up to the International

Space Station and aptly filmed his own rendition of Space Oddity, which drove his popularity through the stratosphere!

4. Nominate other blogs for Blog Awards.

If there's an open call for nominations for any blog awards, nominate other blogs you love to read or have an affiliation with. Sure you could vote for yourself, but add to the karmic balance and give before you receive.

It also doesn't hurt to drop the owner of that blog a little note saying you voted for their site. Don't forget to add your reasons why you voted for them.

Before too long, you'll start seeing other blogs return the favor. Start the process by paying it forward.

5. Google Authorship Rich Snippet

Even though Google recently made the hurdles a little higher for bloggers to get the inline authorship picture in their search results, it doesn't make it any less worth your while. In fact, making it harder has actually increased visibility for those that achieve a rich snippet.

Matt Cutts is Google's head of the webspam team. He's basically the unofficial sheriff of the internet. He's among the few who decides what ranks on the coveted first page of Google's results. And his team has decided to change who gets a rich snippet. Cutts recently addressed those changes at Pubcon Las Vegas:

"We want to make sure that the people who we show as authors are high quality authors. And so we're looking at the process of possibly tightening that up. It turns out if we reduce the amount of authorship we are showing by just about 10 or 15 percent, we're radically able to improve the quality of the authors that we show."

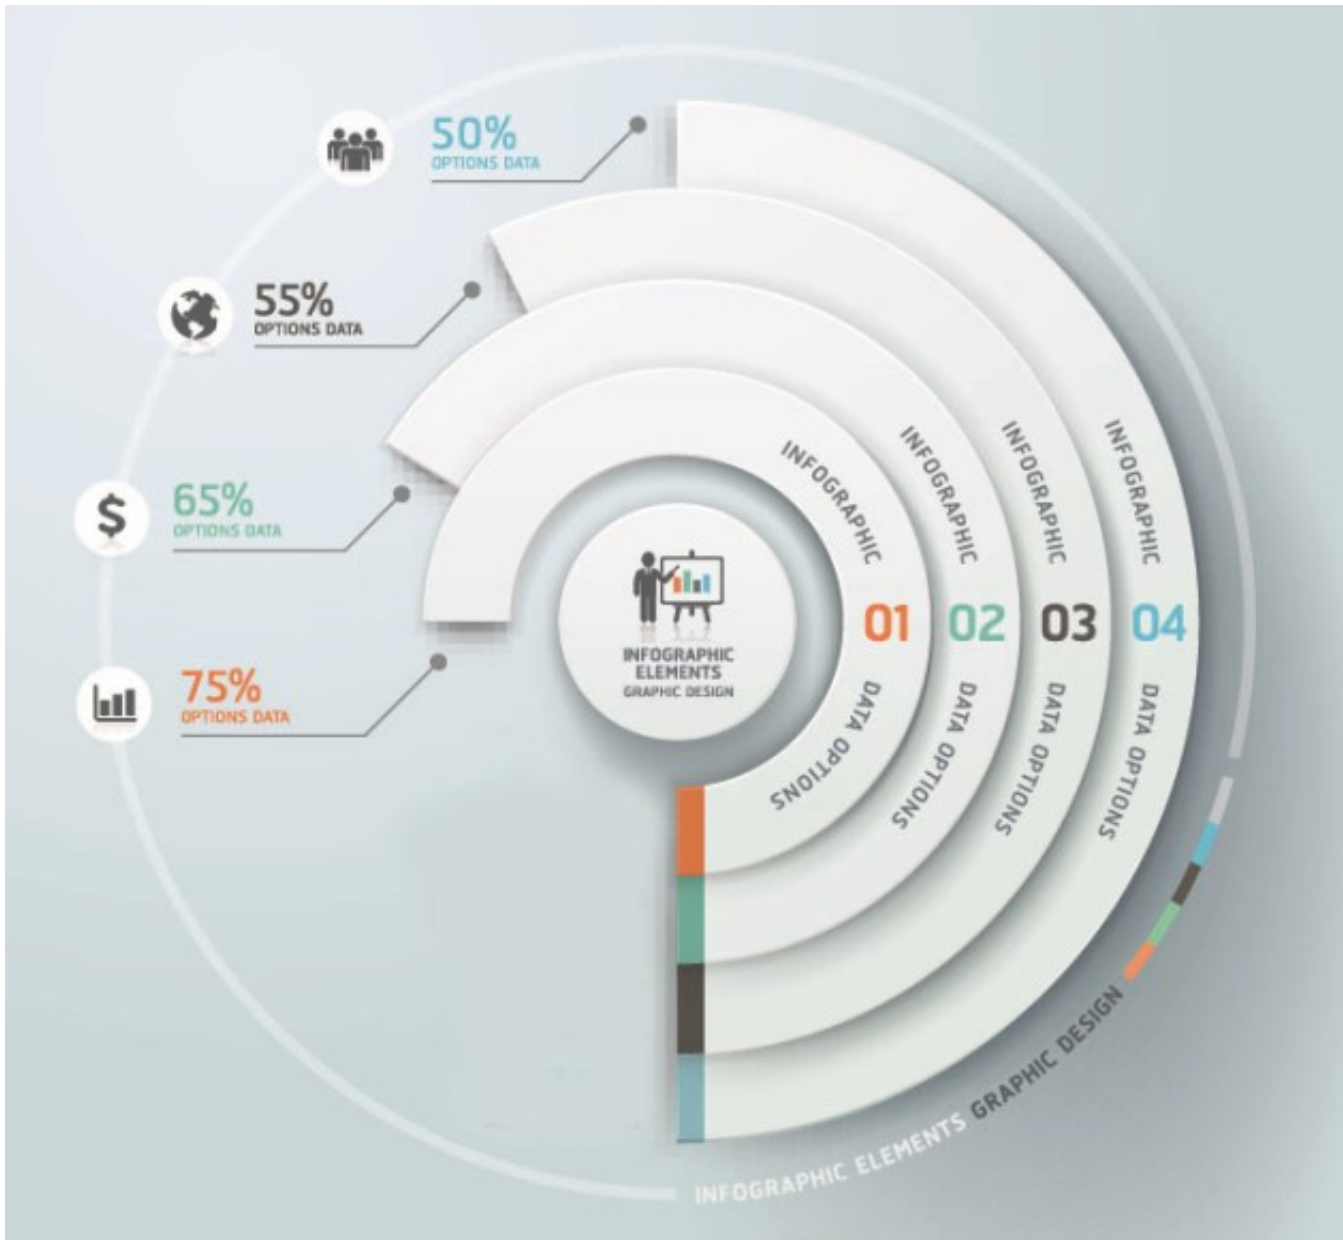

So the best way to achieve Google's authorship rich snippet is to do what you're doing already. Keep pumping out great content.

6. Rich content

Think videos are a waste of time? Anybody watching something on YouTube must not be productive, right?

Think again.

Unlocking the potential of mixed media to explain something that would otherwise require a wall of text will provide a stronger reader reception and exponentially increase your content's shareability.

How often do you see people sharing long, wordy articles on social networks? It's a rarity, right? That's why videos and infographics have taken over on social networks, both in popularity and digestibility.

Have an important concept? Need to really drive it home? Make a video about it.

Have a laundry list of statistics that might be dry and boring? Spice it up with some simple graphics.

Aside from the increased reader interest for rich content, you'll find your information will most likely get shared more frequently.

And humor never hurts.

It's no mystery why entertainers make great teachers. So if you have something you want others to retain, wrapping it in a little humor increases reader satisfaction while still subconsciously driving the point home. Remember, a spoonful of sugar helps the medicine go down.

7. Rethink your use of each social network

- Instagram/Vine

Consider taking a picture or short video of whatever your article is about and put it on Instagram or Vine. Include the title or an attention-grabbing snippet and link to your article in the caption. Is it an automotive piece? Go to a car show and grab a quick video. Housing market article? Drive through the nice neighborhood and snap a few shots of a lovely tree-lined street. Keep it vibrant and enticing.

- Tumblr

This free site functions great for quick-read snippet previews of your articles and is just as capable of handling pictures as the other networks.

- Pinterest

It may seem on the surface that this site isn't made for writers, but that's kind of what we all thought about Instagram too. Find your best rich content from your article and pin it with a link to the full read.

With all these free platforms available for self-promotion, it seems silly to avoid utilizing them to their fullest.

8. Get involved

Nothing compares to a face-to-face interaction. No email, no tweet, and definitely no blog post compares to engaging with someone in person.

Sharing an experience with your target audience is the closest thing to a shortcut on this list. It emotionally bonds you to your audience and promotes you as an authority on the subject.

Any chance you might have, don't shy away from getting involved in the community of your target audience.

Writing about city nightlife? Go dive in, meet people, spread your message and maybe pick up a few article ideas along the way.

Do you consider yourself an expert on a certain subject? Wipe away your fear of public speaking and consider hosting a Ted talk. Ted has quickly become the premier marketplace for idea sharing. Worst case: you meet a few people and get your message heard by a roomful of attentive ears. Best case: your Ted talk gets picked up and cross-promoted on sites like The Huffington Post and Mashable.

The range of topics for Ted talks can go from something as grand as reinventing education in the third world all the way down to proper hand-drying techniques. Your message should fit nicely somewhere on that spectrum.

9. Search forums for frequent or unanswered questions within your target audience

It may surprise you how frequently a question gets asked on a forum that never gets answered.

Dig in to the forum sites used by your target audience. Find frequent questions. Answer them either on the forum or on your site. Even better still, write an article answering the question, then return to the forum to give a brief overview of your answer then link to your site for further reading.

Watch your visitor count grow as you've proven that you are able to provide a needed service by thoughtfully answering those previously unanswered questions.

10. Add a link in your email signature

This low-hanging fruit may seem obvious to some and news to others. Add a link to your site in your email signature. That way every time you email someone you're also providing a quick call to action to come visit your site. Maybe even include a most-recent-article blurb in your signature.

Extra bonus points if the person you're emailing has interest in the subject of that article.

11. Optimize site for mobile and tablet

The public relations firm Walker Sands Digital released a mobile internet traffic report for Q3 of 2013 showing that 28 percent of all internet traffic is coming from mobile devices. Can you really afford to ignore over a quarter of your potential visitors with a site that either doesn't function or doesn't look good on mobile devices?

What this means is you need to avoid website designs that are restricted to only looking good on a PC. And avoid flash. Some users might be able to get flash to work on their android devices, but nearly half of that 28 percent are iOS devices. And iOS is incompatible with flash. Every day that your site doesn't function or looks like garbage on mobile is another day you could be permanently losing visitors.

McKinsey & Company published a report including this bombshell of a statistic: "Google says 61 percent of users are unlikely to return to a mobile site they had trouble accessing. And, even worse, 40 percent visit a competitor's site instead."

Neglecting to address this will automatically minimize who can view your content. Since you're trying to drive traffic to your site, you might want to play nice with the new technology, because it's here to stay.

12. Find creative ways to repurpose visitor feedback and stories

Always be on the lookout for an opportunity to create a story that's generated from a reader's response to one of your articles.

A spotlight on a heartfelt piece of feedback from a story you've written could lead to a very personal article about one of your readers. This is a great way to promote your emotional resonance with your readership. It also proves to your visitors that you are listening and engaging with your readers.

Make your readership feel loved and they will return again and again. And if you're lucky, they'll tell their friends to come along too!

Takeaway

None of these tips will hotwire your site for instant success. These aren't shortcuts for all the hard work of creating a following. Consider each of these 12 suggestions as potential seeds to be planted in the minds of your site's visitors.

Through attentive cultivation and fantastic content creation, any number of these seeds might sprout and help grow a strong reader interest in your site for years to come. And growing a strong reader interest is the most important aspect in converting your visitors into leads and getting paid.
