Email Marketing Tips for Increased Lead Sales – Part 1

By Chaz Wilke, Staff Writer

April 17, 2014

As a marketer, you live and die by traffic. You've got to generate traffic to get sales leads, but do you understand what effect your marketing emails are having on your site's traffic? Have you considered the granular details of your current marketing email strategy? It may be time to take a second look.

You've built a legitimate email list of real contacts and people wanting to hear from you. This was once all you needed. But now it seems there is an increasingly intricate science to capturing the attention of your customers.

This is an ongoing series where we examine tips and tactics that will help your email marketing convert more visitors into leads for sale. In Part One, we look at the incredible value of building trust.

1. Build Trust to Increase Lead Sale

Your Name, Your Brand

There was a time when anonymity on the Internet provided users with a shield of protection. But as the Internet continues to become more transparent, shrouding yourself in anonymity has become suspect. Google has led the charge toward transparency by removing the veil of anonymity and providing real benefits to those bold enough to do business under their real names.

Google calls it authority, but it speaks more to a customer's perception of honest business practices. With the latest series of Google's algorithm tweaks, authority has become increasingly important for those doing business online. Google's authorship markup exemplifies the company's push to present the face and name of the person behind content online.

We now inhabit an Internet ecosystem where people aren't satisfied with just a simple stock photo of someone's face next to some text or a photo of what they read or buy online. Customers want to know that this face is attached to someone involved with what they're buying.

Case in point, compare these two videos:

Missing Plug-in →

It appears this company understands the value of the human face, but doesn't understand the value of the human connection. The robotic voice and stilted animation instantly make the viewer uneasy about the message.

Now look at this video:

Missing Plug-in →

This video embraces the use of genuine flesh-and-blood humans with names, titles, and authority. Both videos discuss building relationships and trust with those they email, but one seems to do so far more effectively.

Building your name as your brand will help jumpstart your position as an authority on the topic that you specialize in. By using a real name, with an accountable human behind your words, your email will be received with an increased perception of trust in the message. This all happens unconsciously and has a profound effect on your call to action's reception.

Proofread

If anonymous marketers risk making people unconsciously mistrustful of them, a lack of proofreading will make them consciously skeptical about the validity of email sales pitches.

Think about all the spam emails you've received over the years. Now think about the ones you didn't instantly recognize as spam. Remember when you realized that the email you were reading was spam? It was right around the first glaring spelling or grammatical error, wasn't it?

Apple's marketing emails get edited with a fine tooth comb by more people than just the writer. Sometimes even Steve Jobs himself would edit the mass emails to nail the tone and position of the message.

Editing your email may take hours, but the benefit is right there in the conversions that your stellar marketing email helps create. Watching all that traffic converting into lead sales can get intoxicating when you really nail a great marketing email. Avoiding glaring spelling and grammatical errors helps build that trust and makes converting your visitors into leads for sales that much easier.

Get Permission

Ask your visitors if they would like to receive emails from you instead of blasting out your marketing messages to random strangers. No one likes receiving unsolicited sales pitches. Remember, the digital marketing conversation starts when interest is shown by the prospective sales lead, not through cold calling.

When you have the recipient's permission to send email, he will be far more receptive to your pitch and will be more likely to convert into a sales lead than would an unwitting recipient.

Also, always remember to include an unsubscribe button, even after a contact has requested that you send him your marketing emails. You always need to provide a way off your distribution list. It's a kind hearted thing to do and after the CAN-SPAM act, it's also the law in the United States.

Joseph Manna at Infusionsoft's Big Ideas Blog reminds email marketers not to bury the unsubscribe link, "Make it visible because receiving an unsubscribe is much better than a spam complaint."

Takeaway

There is no way to overstate the importance of building trust in business. Trust is a fragile commodity -- one whose cultivation requires constant attention. If you have built a trustworthy business and can convey that to your visitors, you can get sales leads by converting a larger portion of your traffic to leads and those leads to sales.
