Email Marketing Tips for Increased Lead Sales – Part 3

By Chaz Wilke, Staff Writer

April 29, 2014

Your online business thrives on inbound traffic, so increasing that traffic will help increase lead sales. Once, you only needed to build a legitimate email list of people wanting to hear from you to dramatically increase your site's traffic. But each day there seems to be something new that an affiliate marketer must consider.

This is an ongoing series where we examine tips and tactics that will help increase the effectiveness of your email marketing. We hope these tips will help drive more traffic to your site and convert more visitors into sales leads.

Previously, we've discussed the all-important endeavor of building trust. Then we looked at marketing email subject lines. Now it's time to discuss the personality that drives your email recipients' interest.

3. Personality Generates Sales Leads

The Likeability Effect

The one constant in sales, from Internet marketers to door-to-door salesmen, is that your personality closes the deal. How you package your pitch is arguably more important than the pitch itself. That old saying, "He could sell ice to an Eskimo," embodies this concept.

You can get nearly anyone to become a sales lead if you show the right personality and presentation. Look at the recent influx of new personality-rich web startup companies. It's now cool, or chic or just plain profitable to inject a little personality into every piece of content a company releases.

There's no reason to think your marketing emails would be exempt from this timeless sales philosophy.

When speaking to an audience you must understand the tenuous nature of their attention. No one has to listen to what you have to say. No one will be forced to engage in your business, click on your links, fill out your forms or become your sales lead. So don't take anyone's attention for granted.

Consider the subject line of your email as the entrance to your theater. Anyone who has clicked through to see your email's content has decided to enter your theater and have a seat. They have declared their active, albeit tenuous, interest in what you might have to say. And with that, they hand over their attention to you.

This is when you wow your potential sales lead.

This is when you sell ice to an Eskimo. You package whatever you're selling as an imperative life changer. You're offering something that solves a serious problem for every potential sales leads. Their daily lives will become so much easier because of what you have to offer. They should be thanking you for granting them the gift of being able to buy from you.

This may sound hyperbolic, but making the sale can become that easy when you approach every customer interaction with this mindset. This is how personality factors into sales. You need the confidence in selling your product or service so no one dares question its need in their lives.

If you're asking how you do this, you're asking the wrong question.

Start with Why

There's a reason why this is difficult for so many Internet marketers. Many are in the business to sell products they don't believe in, wouldn't use, and are only promoting the product or service to make a buck.

Simon Sinek has been a Ted Talk celebrity for many years. His "How great leaders inspire action" speech has accumulated over 16.5 million views. The reason for this large following, you ask? He revealed the trick of every great sales pitch throughout history. It's not what you're selling, and it's not how your service or product works, but why you believe in what you're selling. It's the why that converts your leads to sales.

If you don't know why you sell what you sell, how do you expect to satisfy why potential sales leads would benefit from it in their lives? It's important to remember that profit is a result, not a reason. So saying you do it just for the money provides the least compelling justification for anyone listening to your pitch.

The largest objection a potential sales lead may have, and a marketer must overcome, is the big question of why the lead needs this. Sure, you could guide them to answer the question themselves. You could just show how to use your service, or only explain what your product does, but this requires an engaged audience that is willing to help draw that conclusion on their own.

If you explain why before your customers question it themselves then you've vanquished the potential sales lead's biggest objection before they even realize it. Then it becomes much easier taking that primed sales lead through the conversion funnel.

We operate in a marketplace where choice is abundant and competition is fierce. Potential leads you find now are aware of their options and are only looking for something that benefits their lives. Remember, your customers are not charities. They won't give you money just because you're asking for it. They want a real service or product to solve a real problem in their lives.

And you've got to convince them in an instant.

Takeaway

There are many tactics to entice a visitor into becoming a sales lead, but presenting a glowing personality will help grease the sales wheel every time. You'll find your traffic converting far more often when you show your visitors why you believe the product or service you're selling is the best. This, of course, comes with the caveat that you must also understand why you sell what you sell.
