Email Marketing Tips for Increased Lead Sales – Part 5

By Chaz Wilke, Staff Writer

November 6, 2014

You might already know that effective email marketing has the power to deliver fresh leads. If you operate a lead-driven business, it may be worth your time to read the following email marketing tips. We've previously discussed building trust, marketing email subject lines, and the personality you present in your copy. Now, we will discuss tips on how to make your emails mobile-ready. We'll also talk about "triggered" emails.

Mobile-ready Emails

The email marketing firm Litmus tallied the platforms email recipients used to open 927 million emails in September 2014. Mobile devices took an overwhelming lead, and Apple's iOS led the pack with 39% of all emails opened on the Cupertino, Calif.-based company's platform.

This means your emails need to look stellar on a mobile device. Adjust your email's graphics and wording to look great on smaller screens because these percentages appear poised to keep rising in mobile's favor. If your emails look good only on a web-based client or in Outlook, then you are missing an increasingly large portion of the pie.

Buffer, a popular social media post-scheduling app, provides 5 quick tips for mobile email design:

- Stick to one column for your email layout. This makes the content much easier to scan on a mobile device.
- Use bigger fonts than usual. Bigger fonts read easier on the smaller screens.
- iOS presents guidelines to follow for making buttons for recipients to click in the body of your emails. The smallest you should go is 44 pixels square.
- Put that call to action front and center. Don't expect users to flick and scroll to find a button to press. If you want conversions, make that call to action impossible to miss.
- Remember how people interact with their device. There's no cursor, it's likely all thumb presses. Keep in mind the distance the average person's thumb can stretch across the screen. Try to avoid putting anything you want tapped too far into the upper right corner of the screen.

Triggered Emails help with marketing automation

If you've got a shopping cart on your site, what are you doing for all those visitors who abandon items in that cart? If you answered nothing, then consider triggered emails.

Triggered emails are a part of marketing automation that can help you remind visitors of your products or services. With triggered emails, messages are sent when visitors perform a specific action. Abandoning a filled shopping cart on your site is one example of actions that can trigger an email reminder.

Hubspot offers a list of reasons for sending a triggered email to a visitor. Maybe a visitor downloaded an ebook. Maybe that visitor viewed a specific piece of content.

"For example, if you have content on your website (case studies, blog articles, etc.) that's related to specific industries or target markets, you can infer that people who view that content are in that industry, and tailor your future marketing messages accordingly," Ellie Mirman of Hubspot says.

Takeaway

If you want your marketing email to rise above the noise and stand out from the junk cluttering your recipients' email inboxes, consider taking a tip from us. Making your marketing emails look great on mobile devices helps safeguard your business from the changing technological tide. And instituting a few email triggers on your site can help promote return visits and potentially increase visitor conversions into leads.
