Email Marketing Tips for Increased Lead Sales – Part Two

By Chaz Wilke, Staff Writer

April 23, 2014

Your online business lives and dies by your site's traffic. Your efforts to increase traffic helps you sell leads, but do you understand how your marketing emails affect your site's traffic? Have you scrutinized your current email marketing strategy? It may be time to take another look.

You've built a legitimate email list consisting of people who want to hear from you. This was once all you needed. But the quickly evolving market proves there's always something new that an affiliate marketer must consider.

This is an ongoing series where we examine tips and tactics that will help your email marketing campaigns convert more visitors into sales leads. Previously, Part One discussed the all-important endeavor of building trust. In Part Two, we look at the art of writing marketing email subject lines.

2. Subject Line

Attention vs. Deception

People's attention spans online can only be measured in nanoseconds. Don't bury your witty lead-selling gems deep in your email. Put it all right out there on the subject line.

Consider the amount of time you spend coming up with the titles of your blog posts. The subject line is your email's title, so make it count. Have it shout your call to open the email. Make your title manifest a need in the recipient to click through and read the contents of your message.

The CAN-SPAM act in America has curtailed some of the verbiage allowed in solicitation emails, so it would be smart to avoid any deceptive claims. Even if you're offering something for free it's best to avoid broadcasting that to potential sales leads on the subject line.

Use SEO Keywords Sparingly

Avoid spammy sounding titles that are saturated with keywords. The pursuit of sales leads shouldn't come at the cost of overall readability. You want to entice your potential customer to open your email based on practical reasoning, not confusion.

Keywords are merely based on topics that people are already searching for, so using SEO Keywords related to selling leads is not a bad choice. Remember that you are writing for people, not search engine algorithms. People might notice awkwardly placed lead sales keywords, so try to use those words only when masterfully sandwiching them in a strong call to action.

StartupNation has provided a list of seemingly harmless words to avoid including in your subject line. It asserts that the following list of words might get your email sent directly to the SPAM folder:

- Percent off
- Reminder
- Help
- Buy
- Clearance
- Earn $
- Make $
- Earn
- From home
- Biz
- Cash
- Claim
- Collect
- Income
- Get out of
- Increase your

Focused Simplicity

Business Insider suggests keeping subject lines simple and focused. "Offer one takeaway, indicate how the reader can make use of it, and specify how you will deliver it," says Jenna Goudreau, writing for the online magazine.

Keep the reader engaged and interested with a simple call to action communicated through the subject line. Also remember to keep the subject less than 50 characters. Most email applications will truncate subject lines exceeding that character count. Also, don't forget that a large percentage of potential sales lead recipients will be reading your email on a mobile device that might limit your subject line to around 25 characters.
