Yes, You CAN Make Money Blogging

By Chaz Wilke, Staff Writer

It may sound surprising that you can make money blogging. Especially when you hear that some pro bloggers can pull down hundreds of thousands of dollars a year just by the simple act of writing about things they love. Well, it's true. You can make a decent living blogging. Our friends at probblogger.net offer a few factors to think about before setting out as a professional blogger.

You need to be in a profitable niche!

Passion is important, but operating your blog in a profitable niche is necessary to truly monetize your writing. Certain niches pay more than others, so do your research when selecting one. There are plenty to choose from, and with luck you can find one that speaks to your passions. It is always easier to write about something that drives your personal passion. Dispassionate writing comes off stilted and uninformed which can lead to visitors not wanting to read what you write. This then damages the potential to monetize those visitors.

Remember, your time and your visitors' time are important. Respect that. Find something to write about that will add value to your visitors' lives. This is likely a good way to build a blog with a following that shares your passion and appreciates your contribution to whichever niche you choose. If you choose correctly, you may develop a ravenous following that will jump at the chance to share your content on their social media accounts.

Are you getting sufficient targeted traffic?

This is a big one. Targeted traffic is essentially a highly tailored base of visitors that is eager to engage with your blog and may convert to leads. This is the bread and butter to turning a profit for your blog.

How to get targeted traffic is a much more complex question. SEO helps but won't be a catchall. Remember that writing with an eye on long tail keywords for relevant searches, engaging in social media outreach, and good old fashioned marketing for your blog will all help attract a devoted fan base and target the right traffic to your site. This will help you convert your visitors into leads, which is the basis for payment in most affiliate marketing programs.

Are you building a List?

Lists come in handy when releasing new content. Your content will likely be filled with long tail keywords, meaning multiple word phrases that people often enter into search fields. Terms like "get loan money fast" or "finding leads to convert" are just a few of some common long tail keywords. But, you can't expect a search engine to get you the immediate exposure you might be seeking.

When you build a list, you will now have some immediate distribution power. You've probably built a list of visitors who want to hear from you. Hungry visitors who might want to return right away after you email them about your latest piece of content.

Takeaway

It may sound unbelievable but you really can make money from writing on the Internet. There are many who make a decent living by curating a blog in a profitable niche. There will always be hurdles in pulling down a huge sum just from blogging, but it's not impossible. The three factors outlined above can help you find true north when you first set out in the choppy seas of affiliate marketing and the concept of blogging for money.

So, find your passion and start writing!
